

THERAPY ANIMAL? SERVICE ANIMAL? WORKING ANIMAL? COMPANION ANIMAL?

There are a lot of terms that describe what our animals are and do. Some are legal; some are not. Some make sense; some do not. For some people, like volunteers with CAAA, it's important to understand the differences and how they apply to us.

Working animals are those that perform actual duties to enable the completion of one's career or to complete activities of living. These animals, most commonly dogs, are found in the military, public service departments (police, fire, security), government agencies (FBI, TSA, etc.), professional search and rescue groups and helping persons with disabilities.

Though commonly, and incorrectly, called working animals, those in protection, sports, and therapy work, are not legally working animals. Only those legally recognized as working animals have public access rights. Our therapy animals enjoy special access only in the facility in which they are working. It's illegal to attempt to gain access to places animals are not normally accepted unless yours is a working animal. Even those legally recognized have limitations. It would not, for example, be legal for a person to bring a search and rescue dog into a restaurant or in-cabin on a plane unless that dog was actively involved in or on its way to or from an active search event. It is illegal and immoral to misrepresent your companion or pet as a working animal. Doing so could damage the rights of those who have and need legal access.

Service animals (those working to mitigate a disability) are accorded the most access rights. They are covered by the Department of Justice Code of Federal Regulations which define Public Access in accordance with the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Documentation is not required.

There are some in-between cases such as emotional support animals that are not covered by the ADA but are covered for living arrangements with the Federal Housing Commission and on flights per the rules of TSA. Documentation must be carried.

Search and Rescue, police dogs, fire dogs, security dogs, government dogs and like animals all require documentation for their limited access. Access is allowed only during working hours or travel to and from work.

So where do companion animals and therapy animals fit in? They are our pets. Therapy animals have received some certification and, hopefully, extra training so they can perform their animal-assisted interactions in the numerous places they are welcomed. But they are still pets. A companion animal is just another name for a pet animal.

*Tawni McBee, IACP CDT/PDTI
All Greatful Dogs, Inc.
CAAA Member*

Owner and Head Trainer Kokoro Body Care &

www.allgreatfuldogs.com

(Thank-you, Leslie Horton, chair of the IACP Service Dog Committee, for providing information and definitions to assist with this article.)